

Yolanda Collazo

Individuals can reduce their ecological footprint by reducing the amount of resources they waste. People can also take public transit more often, generating less pollution and sourcing more of your food locally. The most important way to reduce your ecological footprint is to change the way you use energy, such as purchasing energy efficient light bulbs and using solar panels. Buying products that use less packaging materials and recycling can also help.